

New Directions in Criminology and Criminal Justice in Indo-American Perspective

Under

MHRD Scheme on Global Initiative of Academics Affairs

Overview-

Criminology, Criminal Justice, and Criminalistics are disciplines that have advanced considerably in the last few decades. The criminological theory has begun to examine ideas beyond usual questions of why people commit a crime and to explore how criminal categories are constructed and why reactions to criminal behavior vary in place, time and by population. Criminological methods have moved beyond the use of official data and surveys to incorporate newer qualitative, quantitative approaches and crime solving techniques. The parts of the criminal justice system: the police, courts, and corrections have each been revolutionized in a number of ways. These include the investigation of “cold cases” (i.e., long unresolved crimes), community and problem-oriented policing, procedural justice methods, processes for qualifying expert testimony, civilianization, restorative justice, internal security, crime prevention etc.

The basic purpose is to provide information for learning, discussion and action to audiences in Indo-American criminology and criminal justice in order to enhance the knowledge base and action models of academics and practitioners like police, judiciary, correctional personnel and public administration.
